

AGGRESSION

What drug makes you aggressive.....

For some families, their first discovery that a loved one is using drugs is an all-out battle with someone who'd previously been calm and friendly. Without knowing that drugs are behind the aggressive tirade they're witnessing, it's a terrifying experience.

The person often becomes violent putting others around him at risk. Police may be called, the drug user may be arrested. or thrown out of the house. If the angry aggression is severe enough to send the person into a breakdown, he (or she) may end up in the emergency room.

Most people in this condition are unable to tell doctors what they have taken so medical staff have to guess, a risky tactic when they are trying to save the person's life. And these problems most often trace back to a small bag of whitish powder or crystals. Sometimes they are purchased from a drug dealer or they might come from China or Poland via an underground website. The real danger of a drug that can make someone severely aggressive and angry is that some of them can also put a person into a physical meltdown that can result in death. Or they could become angry at the wrong person and find themselves on the receiving end of an assault.

Stimulants are Most Frequently the Culprits The various stimulant drugs, especially when taken heavily or on a long binge, can bring about paranoia or hallucinations. When they do, the drug user may feel the need to strike out at those around him, just for his own protection. It's common that he'll think that people are trying to harm him or that cars are following him or that there are evil people living in his walls or television.

He may finally crash after being up for days, but if he has more of the drug, he's likely to start right up again when he wakes up. Stimulant drugs are very highly addictive for most users. This class of drugs includes:

Alcohol Cocaine Crack cocaine Crystal Meth Methamphetamine and amphetamine Bath Salts like mephedrone, MDPV or methylone Spice, also known as synthetic marijuana Drugs like cocaine, methamphetamine or amphetamine usually cause these dangerous effects after long binges or heavy, chronic use. Bath salts or spice can cause problems at any time.
